

ARCH|Capital

I'm Brett Schafer, one of Arch Capital's portfolio managers. Along with Ryan, I run the partnership's investment strategy. My interest in investing started in college, and I've been in love with it ever since.

I graduated from Washington State University in 2019 with a degree in mechanical engineering and minors in finance and mathematics. At WSU, I played on the football team for three years as a kicker. At school, I worked for the Shock Physics lab doing research projects for the Department of Energy and worked at the Sports Science Lab doing research for Major League Baseball, helping them solve their home run problem.

Outside of Arch Capital, I enjoy working on the company's podcast and writing for the Motley Fool. Outside of investing, my hobbies include hiking/backpacking, watching Seattle sports teams, and reading business history. Very exciting, I know.

I'm grateful to our partners for allowing me to do something I love: researching and investing in businesses.